Contrapunctus 14

This great final fugue of Die Kunst Der Fuge was the piece that Bach left unfinished when he died. Some editions number it as Contrapunctus 19 or as Contrapunctus 18. It is not actually his last composition; that honour belongs to the chorale prelude on Vor Deinen Thron Tret' Ich Hiermit which he dictated to his pupil Altnikol before taking leave of his family.

As Bach left Contrapunctus 14, it is a triple fugue: the first exposition starts at bar 1, the second at bar 114, and the third, on the notes B-A-C-H, at bar 193. Bach had previously been very sparing in the use of the notes of his own name, probably not thinking it appropriate to sign his life's work before it was complete. The three subjects are combined at bar 234, just before Bach's manuscript breaks off in bar 239. Bach left bar 239 with all eight quavers of the tenor, the alto and bass with just their first note, and with the soprano blank.

None of the fugue's three subjects is the theme of Die Kunst Der Fuge, and the Gesamtaufgabe even suggested that this fugue should not be considered to be part of that work. In 1880, Gustav Nottebohm pointed out the solution: the theme of Die Kunst Der Fuge, with one small rhythmic adjustment, fits in counterpoint with the other three subjects. This combination can be seen at bar 306 in the current edition. Nottebohm's discovery made it clear that the fugue was intended by Bach as a quadruple fugue with the theme of Die Kunst Der Fuge as the fourth subject, and there have since been several attempts to complete the fugue on this basis.

The most spectacular completion is that of Ferruccio Busoni in his Fantasia Contrappuntistica of 1912, which is published by Dover together with the Elegies and Sonatinas. Stylistically it is sometimes pure Bach, sometimes pure Busoni, and Busoni moves freely and smoothly between these poles, demonstrating the unity of the tradition, and blurring the boundaries between composition, editing, and performance. After an introduction of 201 bars, followed by Bach's fugue, Busoni adds 473 bars of his own, particularly favouring the eloquent second subject.

An important completion is that of the English composer and pianist Donald Francis Tovey, 1875-1940, which was published in 1931 on C-clefs in open score by Oxford University Press and is now out of print.

We should treat as inspiring Tovey's courage in measuring up to Bach himself on his home territory and at the height of his powers. Tovey's erudition and hard work almost achieve the stylistic authenticity that he was seeking. The set pieces, such as Nottebohm's passage at bar 306 and its inversions at bars 280 and 263, are very fine; but, especially in the free voices, one can still notice the join. In the Tovey there are longer runs of parallel thirds or sixths, more scalar passages, more voice-crossings, more extremes of register and of texture. And in the Bach there is a luminous, fluent, quaver-by-quaver, never-failing beauty that is not easily matched.

While Tovey was at work, Busoni's Fantasia Contrappuntistica was published, but Tovey refrained from consulting it until his own work was finished in 1928. For organ, Michael Ferguson's 1990 completion could be considered; it is available from Holbrook, 2402 University Ave, Saint Paul, Minnesota 55114, USA. Extremely impressive, and by far the most plausibly Bachian, is the 1998 completion by Zoltán Göncz, available from Carus Verlag, number 18.018, ISMN: M-007-09051-7, see www.carus-verlag.com

The current edition is the first to make Tovey's work available in practical formats. It is available for keyboard, and there are parts for SATB recorders, and for violin, viola and two 'cellos. In the recorder version, the Bass should preferably be doubled by a Great Bass. The Alto and Tenor lines divide in the penultimate bar. There is no separate score; the keyboard edition is recommended instead. All these are available from www.pjb.com.au
